The People's Climate March on September 21, 2014 showed U.S. and world leaders that large numbers of people in the United States care about the climate crisis. The march was the largest climate action in history with 400,000 marchers in New York City. Thousands more people participated in 2,808 other rallies in 166 countries, including 40,000 in London, 30,000 in Melbourne, 25,000 in Paris and 10,000 in Berlin.

The march successfully changed the notion that climate change was just an environmental issue. The march made it clear that this is also a social and economic justice struggle.

The People's Climate Movement continues to build on that energy and excitement and expand across the country. We are calling for a sustainable, democratic and just economy that preserves our planet and works for all peoples.

By acting now we can prevent the worst consequences of global warming. We can build a fair economy that sustains a living environment while promoting good jobs and social and economic justice.

This National Day of Action is six weeks before international climate talks in Paris. We are calling on organizations and individuals to demand that bold steps to be taken to address the global climate crisis.
